I. EYEWITNESS IDENTIFICATIONS ARE NOT RELIABLE

United States v. Owens, 682 F3d 1358 (11th Cir. 2012) observed that "eyewitness identification errors are the principal cause of wrongful convictions in the United States." The majority of courts permit the use of expert witnesses who can explain to a jury how several factors that undermine the accuracy of identifications. For example, scientific literature indicates that the reliability of eyewitness testimony is dependent on the police procedures used in the identification process. When the lineup or photo array administrator knows who the suspect is, it is inevitable that the administrator's behavior will influence the witness' choice in making the identification. See New Jersey v. Henderson, 27 A3d 872, 896 (2011). Convictions based on eyewitness testimony are open to attack in post conviction petitions because the courts are more receptive to the argument that the testimony might not be reliable.¹¹
